Montreal Fog

by Asa Boxer (August 2022)

The Cathedral, Marie Rioux, 2020

The clouds drop a heavy fog, pulling the sky down over the mountain, and the fog crouches, squats over the city, waving its shrouded arms threatening the tallest, most imposing feats of engineering with erasure.

The fog brings low the mutant-green glow of Desjardins Bank, the Christmas-blue of the Jacques Cartier Bridge, the rose blush of Scotia Bank, rubbing them all into the city's face, smudging them in with other indistinct lights: cosmetics and bruises, the sky done up like an odiferous junkie after a full day of turning tricks, bumming cigarettes and staggering around traffic to collect enough coin for another fix.

If the fog genuflected to the city's third floor, it would collect every neon blaze upon its breast, reflect, like one transfixed by smart-phone glaze, the commercially distressed state of affairs afflicting this place.

Take the city for a massive, metahistoric, geological beast, lumbering along at a timescale wherein a human life passes as briefly as a hummingbird pausing to dip its beak into a flower: it suffers the barnacles of civilisation obliviously, as we sustain the bacteria, the archaea, the fungi living out their dramas among the Tigris and Euphrateses, among the Rubicons, the Volgas, the Gangeses, the Nileses, and the Mississippis riverring among our resource-rich cells.

The way this fog hovers darkly, flying in near as a mirror brought in close enough for self inspection, I wonder if the seer will recognise why this portion of the Earth has lost the stars, whether this fog is prelude to some geological action akin to a rubbing of the eye and perceive in myself an unaccountable wish to feel the back of that grand hand, to have this murky vision cleared, and I wonder how many others, yes, how many bloody-minded others are with me in this fog.
