

Jorge Luis Borges Honors Five Poets

Translated from the Spanish

By Evelyn Hooven (July 2018)

Though this multi-lingual Argentine poet was fond of German (Heine's verse in particular), his connection to English poetry (including its austerely forceful Germanic origin in the Anglo-Saxon of the Beowulf poet) was particularly inclusive and pronounced: William Blake, John Keats. But I find it especially moving that the near-blind Borges reaches back across the centuries to pay intense homage to the blind and very great John Milton—a lofty instance of professional courtesy.

Heine in Paris, 1856

Protracted illness accustomed him to anticipate death. It would make him fearful of going forth into clamorous day or of moving among others. Brought low, Heinrich Heine thinks of that river, time, that moves slowly, remote from this large darkness and from the dolorous fate of being man and Jew.
He thinks of the intricate melodies whose instrument he has been, but he knows well that the trill belongs not to the arbor or the bird but to time with its vague meanderings.

They cannot save you, no, not your nightingales nor flower cantatas, your gilded nights.

Lines Written in a Copy of the Beowulf Epic

I ask myself from time to time for reasons that move me to study, not expecting mastery, while my own night advances, this language of the acerbic Saxons.
Exhausted through these years, memory falls down in a vain repetition of each word and it goes as my life goes—it unravels, re-weaves its own tired story.
It might be (I therefore tell myself) that from a mode secret, sufficient, the soul knows it is immortal and—vast and laden—sets forth for everywhere, can do all things.
Far beyond this longing and this verse it waits for me, inexhaustible universe.

A Rose and Milton

From the generations of roses that have been lost in the depths of time, I wish that one may be saved from oblivion, one without name or sign among things that have been. Destiny will accord me this gift of naming for the first time that silent flower, the very last rose that Milton, unseeing, drew towards his face. O you, vermillion or yellow or white rose from a boarded-up garden, already magically your past shines out, through this verse and immemorial, gold, crimson, ivory or shaded as though in his hands, o invisible rose.

Blake

Where might the rose be that in your prodigal hand, unknowing, makes gifts of the personal?

Not in the color, for the flower is blind, nor in the sweet, unfading fragrance, nor in the petal's weight. Things like these are few and no more than lost echoes.

The true rose is even further away.

It can be a pillar or a grand battle or a firmament of angels or a world infinite, secret and necessary, or jubilation from a god we can't see or a planet of silver in another sky or a terrible archetype that does not assume the form of the rose.

To John Keats (1795-1821)

From the beginning to your youthful death the terrible beauty awaited you as for others a fate lucky or adverse.

It waited for you in the dawns of London, in the casual pages of a myth dictionary, in the common givens of the day, in a face, a voice, and in the mortal lips of Fanny Brawne.

O Keats, snatched away, posthumous, whom time itself blinds, the far nightingale and Grecian urn are your eternity, o fugitive one.
You were the fire. In memory's anguish today you are not ashes. You are glory.
