Just a Phase

by Carl Nelson (August 2021)

Christina's World, Andrew Wyeth, 1948

My lawnmower, one day, found itself wandering about in a state of wonder after having chewed up my zinnias before coming to its practical senses. Somehow, or other, my lawnmower had acquired a soul along with, it seems, a lot of other baggage.

It no longer found parked in the garage over an oil spot self-enhancing. It had a larger purpose. Because, why would it have a smaller purpose? Or the same purpose, now that it was aware of so much?

Meanwhile, the child across the street had lost hers and only wanted to stay in the dark garage and come out once a week to chew grass. A normal family would have been beside themselves, but this one decided it was just a phase.

What larger purpose could a lawnmower have? It meditated, had me ship it to India, re-affirmed its vegetarian nature and insisted this world was an illusion. "The world as you imagine it does not exist," my lawnmower said, while preaching to the other lawnmowers which came to hear. They overflowed—blue, green, red—my two car garage.

Meanwhile the girl across the street was chewing everyone's yard. We became a lawnmower's Mecca. Psychologists came to study the girl across the street.

Then, one day, everything returned to normal. My lawnmower sat silent in the garage. The girl across the street found a boyfriend. It was just a phase, I finally decided.

The Story of Kibbu

Why compare her to a rose, when in the fictional world of Yanjette, there is rumored to be a flower whose fragrance, when breathed can make a man grow three times his size! Compare her with that.

In the village of Halvetia there is a bird who perches in the village square whose feathers are so beautiful and whose song so entrancing as to make thieves forget their business and squires run away with their milkmaids. Compare her with that!

Way south in Africa where the Tutu live is a snake so golden as to be followed everywhere by greedy men.
Until one day it disappeared down a hole and they all followed after.
When it came out again it was three times its size and three times its splendor. So much so that even the prudent men could not help but follow it down the hole.

This happened again and again, over and over until there was only one person left in the entire village. His name was Kibbu, and he was addled and collected pretty flowers.

Kibbu did not care for shimmering gold. The snake was so distressed by this, she shed her shimmering skin and disappeared back down the hole for good.

News of his triumph spread, and Kibbu was soon able to make his living gathering flowers and ignoring vices of all sorts which manifest in the villages surrounding.

Until one day he came upon the village of Halvetia and the bird that was so beautiful he could not ignore her.

Instead, he offered her his pretty flowers, and they flew off together.

Compare yourself with Kibbu!
