

Remembrance

by Evelyn Hooven (September 2020)

Meditation, Gabriel Münter, 1917

(A Monologue from my play "Variations for Uncertain Instrument," a Work-in-Progress)

It was not so bad

After the deep knowledge settled

After that interminable while

It was not so painful . . .

Alone turning pages

Alone with music

Sometimes avid

Start of the morning

Amazingly bright—

The light was extraordinary

That funeral day.

(As in a reverie)

Not to be stone

Not to be bronze to the core

Is dangerous, dangerous—

The people are dazed by this radiance

Something contorts their faces

Anaesthesia, imminent breakage—

It is clear

They will never endure

Ship them ever so crated

Or filled with excelsior

Mark them exceptionally fragile

They must turn out
Frangible, asunder—
Incomplete.

This is the madness of sun
This must be their strange festival—
Precarious
Without pedestals
Occasion
Of losses—
Their creator puts out
No hand
To repair them
Perhaps he is sleeping
Or elsewhere, making
What thrives intact
What holds out forever.

Gently!
They did not lower him
Tenderly enough—

In the night
I dreamed of rain
Pelting, assaulting
Earth eroded
Such penetration
Of sound
Diminution of roots—
I dreamed
I was to meet him—
Rain—I carried
A covering—
He did not come—
Was his protection
Enough
For all he would go through?

They did not lower him
Tenderly enough—
I never am sure
If he rests well . . .
