The Sparrow

by David Solway (October 2015)

And again with their wings against your windows...

Gustavo Adolfo Bécquer, "Rima LIII," Book of the Sparrows

 ${f I}$ t sat on the edge of the highway near enough to the landscaped margin to provide a touch of irony, wings folded the way a spectator folds his arms as if to gauge the contestants in any event. I slowed down for an instant, conscience on the brakes, expedience in the rearview mirror, then slammed the gas pedal to the floor. The car spurted wings and flew down the very same highway. It was only an instant but long and bright enough to reveal the blink in its bird's-eye view from below. The small head turning calmly observed the traffic: no revving of feathers, stalled by a thunderous exit, it awaited the outcome as in uninvolved.

I had good reasons for not stopping:

the traffic, the bird was half-dead anyway,

I had to get home before rush hour,

what did I know about broken wings?

Today I passed the bird again, now

tossed on a shore of gravel, abandoned

like a small boat or a bottle

without a note in it, wings spread

like a crack in the windshield, as hushed

and startling as a verdict.

____

David Solway is a Canadian poet and essayist. His forthcoming volume of poetry, Installations, will be released this fall from Signal Editions. A partly autobiographical prose manifesto, Reflections on Music, Poetry and Politics, is slated for later this year with Mosaic Press. A CD of his original songs, Blood Guitar and Other Tales, appeared last summer. Solway's current projects include work on a second CD with his pianist wife Janice and writing for the major American political sites such as PJ Media, FrontPage Magazine, American Thinker and WorldNetDaily.

To comment on this poem, please click