

Two Poems

by Jeffrey Burghauer (September 2018)

Lycidas, Henry Fuseli, 1820

[1] Suburban Monody

I never thought: "When I get older,
I'll own a boulder."

But there's one in my backyard.

I never thought that someday I'd boast
Owning a lamppost.

By the boulder it stands guard.

A tire whose pressure seems exact,
Might, in point of fact,
Be preparing to explode.
I, though not at all presumptionless,
Never reckoned this Information I was owed.

A surprise: They still abhor the Jew.
Furthermore, who knew
Pain could colonize . . . a knee?
It appeared supremely understood
That I never would Have kids intentionally.

But my chest became an icy sluice,
Dearest Lycidas,
When, receiving no reply,
I forced through your bedroom's heavy lock,
And succumbed to shock
At the fact that people die.

Le Voile, William-Adolphe Bouguereau, 1898

[2] Eclogue

after William-Adolphe Bouguereau

The heat is Broken like a droplet's skin. Fasten

The fair, fresh-uncoiled strings, each
Attempting to determine what it Means to abide beneath unheard-of Tensions, their untried, infinitely
Discoverable authority
On wayside sympathetic strings,
On mahogany, maple, spruce, brass,
Bone & ebony—On human skin,
And on heaven's common air. Beware:
Dermal vapors rising through the thin,
Suburbanly-laundered linen in-
To an olfactosphere busy with
Breeze-shaken buds, botryoidal moss,
Thickened vegetative floss,
Wet granite, damp tobacco, wine, and
All those soft, kindred occasions of New heat, each singularly a-pulse,
Trailing its Nazareth lace of fruit
Shampoo & talcumey showerstuff.

In Arcadia, one's vices grow
Selfless, as they were a world ago.

Jeffrey Burghauser is an English teacher in Columbus, Ohio. He was educated at SUNY-Buffalo, the University of Leeds, and currently studies the five-string banjo with a focus on pre-WWII picking styles. A former artist-in-residence at the Arad Arts Project (Israel), his poems have previously appeared (or are forthcoming) in Appalachian Journal, Lehrhaus, New English Review, and Iceview (Iceland).

Follow NER on Twitter @NERIconoclast