An Impersonal Sonnet

She said she would not write a sonnet for him, no, not him, not he who left the bed unmade, the kitchen counter dirty, floor unswept, not he who always wanted sex at five am, no, no, she would not write a sonnet for that man, not he who left his socks inside his stinky boots, the lights on in the attic, the darks inside her head because she would not hurt him, not him fixed like an ever-fixed crumb upon the table, unshaken, he said, in his love, unmixed in his affection what e'er she did, that fabled guy who kept on bearing her to the edge of doom, the man who admitted no impediment, that one

The Woman Who Painted Her Nails liked to look at them as she sat
with other women,
at lunch or book club,
even at meetings of the board, sometimes holding them before her as they talked
as if to say stop, stop, wouldn't you rather admire these perfect pink ovals than your ragged concerns about justice and truth.
We, who had been beauty, do not mention
the VOCs and DBPs
the toluene and formaldelhyde that make possible
our well-groomed claws.
