

Berlin 'Lost To Arab Clans' Now Recruiting 'Physically Strong Young Migrants'

report, which reveals how Arab migration has transformed Berlin's entire criminal landscape, exposes how extended migrant families, now recruiting new migrants, run the entirety of the city's organised crime.

The report speaks of the 'amazing' sight of luxury sedans cruising up to refugee, asylum centre, and migrant lodgings filled with "people who have lost everything."

Investigators reported that the criminal gangs have "exploited the situation" of the migrant crisis, in which German Chancellor Angela Merkel's policies saw well over a million migrants from the third world world settle in Europe last year.

The source explained that "young and physically strong men" are targeted by the gangs and then used for "dirty work" like burglaries, drug trafficking, and fights with criminal competitors. Child refugees are also welcomed as their faces are unknown to the police.

Despite the prospect of arrest, or even going to prison, many of the new arrivals are willing to take the risk as it is unlikely they will be deported.

Germany's problems with its immigrant population are nothing new. According to authorities in Berlin the majority of the city's organised crime is controlled by seven to nine extended families who came in the late 1970s from Lebanon.

Dirk Jacob, the director of the State Criminal Police

Office (LKA), describes how the clans specialise in property crime and drug trafficking. They show their power in the city wiith highly visible stunts such as the “daring daylight