

Christie Blatchford was merciless when she saw injustice

by Conrad Black

Friday was the first anniversary of the death of Christie Blatchford, who must rank as one of the outstanding journalists of my time in the Canadian newspaper business, (more than 50 years). A number of readers, among many who miss her yet, have asked several of us at the National Post to elaborate on what we wrote a year ago, and from the perspective of the year, to describe the legacy of her qualities and personality. As National Post.