DHS Says Mexican Border "More Secure now than it has Been in Many, Many Years" newspaper report Mayorkas defended government efforts to stem the flow of illegal immigration, which is laughable considering a record number of illegal aliens have entered the U.S. in the last year. Then he said the United States is a "welcoming, embracing nation that does not operate in isolation." This appeared to be an effort to justify the tens of thousands of illegal aliens that have crossed into the U.S. lately through Mexico, a huge chunk of them entering through Texas where the forum was held. Then came the kicker, that "the border is more secure not than it has been in many, many years." It was not clear in the news article if Mayorkas delivered the line with a straight face, but he proceeded to pile it on by adding that apprehensions have dropped significantly and that the U.S. works "very closely with our partners [in Mexico] to address illegal migration." One last comment before we delve into the deputy secretary's background. He said that the Obama administration has a "wonderful partnership with leaders in the Mexican government that are focused on security."

> Mayorkas initially served as director of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) for the Obama administration and came under fire for reportedly Islamic terrorists were apprehended in 36 hours in McAllen and Pharr, Texas. Last summer, as an ongoing series on the porous southern border, JW narco-terror ring with connections running from El Paso to Chicago to New York City.
>
> Earlier this year JW obtained