

Enclaves of Islam see UK as 75% Muslim

From Mail on Sunday

Some Muslims lead such separate lives that they believe Britain is an Islamic country where the majority of people share their faith, according to a report to be published this week.

Evidence gathered by Dame Louise Casey, the government's community cohesion tsar, will lift the lid on how some Muslims are cut off from the rest of Britain with their own housing estates, schools and television channels. Her report finds that thousands of people from all-Muslim enclaves in northern cities such as Bradford, Dewsbury and Blackburn seldom, if ever, leave their areas and have almost no idea of life outside...the report will send 'shock waves' through the system by attacking the Government, and particularly the Home Office, for failing to manage the consequences of mass migration and promote integration.

...the report will (also) criticise the police for 'pandering' to ethnic minorities and say some institutions are so politically correct that they are playing into the hands of the far Right.

Dame Louise reportedly had her review delayed by the Home Office because of concerns over its critical tone. Those familiar with the report say Casey, who investigated failings by children's services at Rotherham council after the child abuse scandal, has seen off attempts by the Home Office to water down her report. One insider said it was going to prove 'quite hard reading for some people'.

Downing Street declined to comment last night.

Sir Michael Wilshaw, the departing chief inspector of schools, warns today that about 500 schools in England are either 100% white or 100% ethnic minority – and pupils in them are at risk of alienation and radicalisation.

Wilshaw told The Sunday Times that parallel communities were developing in Britain and children growing up in monocultural schools in these communities were in danger of being cut off from British values and vulnerable to either far-right or Islamist causes. The teaching unions are so far-left that I don't think any child is in danger of exposure to any even vaguely right views in a British school.

Casey has examined the social alienation felt by the white working class. Although her report will not dismiss the far right it will say that Islamist extremists pose a more serious threat.

The chief inspector said that he was particularly worried about a cluster of 21 schools in Birmingham – many of them primaries with predominantly Muslim pupils – where there were no white pupils. Nearly half of the schools have been judged “less than good”.
