

"How Long Do We Have To Apologize For The Acts Of World War II?"

A statement, by a German, quoted in an article published today in the Christian Science Monitor.

Not apologize, but make amends, in domestic and foreign policy.

The best way to make amends, pitiful though those amends may be in comparison to the damage done before and during that war, is to make sure that Europe, devastated by the Nazis, is not devastated by their truest inheritors, the carriers of Islam, allowed so negligently and foolishly to settle deep behind those borders which Islam teaches are to be regarded as enemy lines. And the best way to make amends to those most harmed by the German Nazis, and not only by them but by all their willing collaborators in so many European lands, that is to the Jewish people, is to make sure that Europe remains, or again becomes, a safe place for Jews to live and to travel. That can best be done, that can only be done, by limiting the power, influence, and numbers of today's most dangerous carriers of implacable antisemitism, Muslims.
