

UK Election 2015

On the good side Miliband and Clegg and the traitors of Labour and the Liberal democrats (a once good party warped by the entry of the Labour renegades the Social democrats in 1988) are subdued. The leaders, as dubious a pair as ever stood for office have held their seats (just), but look likely to be deposed as party leaders.

George Galloway lost his seat in Bradford to a young woman he ran a nasty and personal campaign against. She may be Muslim and she may be Labour but she was a forced teenage bride, and Galloway insisting that she lied and was 16 not 15 when it happened still wouldn't justify what her family did to her. And the police are investigating his conduct.

The coalition from hell, Trotskyist Ed Miliband of Labour and wee Jimmy Krankie aka Nicola Sturgeon of the Scottish National Party won't happen. Although the evil that they would have wrought may have been the catalyst the sleeping populace needs to stir it, as Lee Rigby, the grooming gangs and the rest have not been.

On the bad side the SNP with just over a million votes have 96% of the seats in Scotland; UKIP with nearly 4 million votes hold only one in England.

The Torys (I cannot call them Conservatives – they are not conserving our country, our heritage or much of value) have a mandate to carry on indistinguishable from the other legacy parties.

Nigel Farage didn't get elected and has now
