

Young British Muslims think Isis fighters returning from Syria should be reintegrated into society, research finds

From the Far left leaning One interviewee warned: “When people feel isolated and angry because they are not being treated with respect and if they go out and fight in Syria and when they come back there is no help, then I promise you, you will see more terrorism because these young people will think why should I do anything when my own Government don't care about me.”

The Independent's editorial stance is very left-wing, often somewhat to the left of the notorious Guardian newspaper. The readership, happily, is more practical. Dr Awan interviewed 50 young Muslims from 'sensitive' areas. More than 50 Independent readers have made comments like these most commended:-

Martiansunite : They need to stand trial if they have been involved in terrorism and murder. Welcome them back with a welfare package – really? I don't want them back at all and no idea why they'd want to come back to a country that is totally against their evil message and way of living.

M B: Or we could prosecute them for war crimes like they deserve.

Pabloid; That attitude is predictable and obvious. What they mean is that they should be allowed to form strong networks and be ready to strike when unanticipated.

Dog Tag: they should not be allowed into our country – they are murderers and rapists – personally I would applaud if they were strung up on the nearest lamppost as soon as they set foot in the UK.

stevencarrwork